Music Content Expert: Katie Condon
Summary

The research questions for this project were: how can I use the content area of music in an intensive, El Sistema-inspired after school string program to increase literacy and improve reading comprehension for my students and how do goals for increased literacy and improved reading comprehension align with an El Sistema-inspired program with goals for social change. This curriculum is an answer to these questions.

My research focused on four main areas. First, what is the connection between prosody and reading comprehension? What evidence do we have that a more advanced understanding of prosody correlates with skilled reading? Second, what is critical pedagogy and how does it inform literacy instruction? Third, what is El Sistema, what does it look like in the United States and around the world, and what effect does an intensive El Sistema program have on academic and psychosocial measures? Lastly, is there a correlation between music training and enhanced prosodic awareness?

This curriculum is written for my 3rd and 4th grade students violin students that study in an El Sistema-inspired partnership program with MacPhail Center for Music and Ascension Catholic School in North Minneapolis. It contains 30 lesson plans, each 35 minutes in length. Each lesson contains objectives and activities for musical development (identified in purple), psychosocial awareness and development (identified in red), prosodic sensitivity and literacy development (identified in green), and community building (identified in blue). Lessons regarding prosodic sensitivity aim to develop the ear to hear pitch, rhythm, volume, and emphasis cues in both language and music.
Included with the lesson plans is an extensive appendix. Each song or activity that is referenced in the lessons are included in this appendix so that the lessons could be recreated by another teacher. Many of the songs used in the curriculum come from Suzuki Violin book 1, which is included in a bibliography at the end. Any other activities included are ideas of my own or songs and words that have been passed down from teacher to teacher throughout the many years of school partnership teaching at MacPhail Center for Music.

The intended audience for this curriculum includes music and violin teachers in traditional and El Sistema-inspired programs around the world and ESL teachers who wish to use music activities to teach prosodic awareness. Additionally, this project and the accompanying research paper makes the case for continued arts funding in the schools and therefore is also aimed towards policy-makers and funders of the arts in K-12 schools and after school programs.

In the implementation of this project at Ascension Catholic School during the fall 2017 semester, I have been able to see real growth in my students around prosodic awareness. My students can identify changes in pitch in both language and music and can describe the ways that changes in pitch are used in language to convey meaning. They can describe the way rhythm is used in language by identifying and clapping syllables and can translate these rhythms to musical rhythms. They can identify words that are emphasized in a sentence as well as notes that are emphasized in a musical phrase. Lastly, they can hear and identify changes in volume in both language and music and can use the appropriate musical terms to describe the level of volume.
My research showed that enhanced prosodic awareness correlates with improved reading comprehension and that musical training correlates with enhanced prosodic awareness. This curriculum bridges the gap between these two sets of research. Further research would be needed to show that reading comprehension has improved and reading proficiency scores on statewide testing have increased.
